

Onah stated:

“Regarding preferences, I believe the timing of posts is crucial, especially since we serve two or three groups of audiences.

Our changemakers in Liberia and Uganda (approximately 6-7 hours time difference from the US) and our US-based audiences. This means that if you post at 7 am EST, which might be peak time in the US, it would already be 2 pm in Uganda and 11am in Liberia, which are not peak periods for them. (For Liberia 11am is the second peak period of the day so that works too)

If a post resonates with our US-based mentors, community, donors, etc., 7 am EST works. However, if it speaks to our audiences in Uganda and Liberia, we would aim for 7 am EAT/GMT, which is often around 12 am or 1 am. Scheduling helps in this regard.”

Cedric asked for us to:

- share the collected data with him
- some things they could do differently
- create content and schedule future content
- how to drive more engagement
- to see what are best practices for organizations like theirs
- unconventional things to drive engagement